

Learn Job Skills on the Web

The news tells us the sad story every day: U.S. unemployment figures are running at nearly 10%. Unemployment is a “lagging indicator,” so even as the economy improves, there won’t be much hiring going on for a while. That means that the competition for the few open jobs will remain fierce for the foreseeable future. Successful candidates must possess basic workplace competencies such as good communication skills and the ability to use technology.

Our libraries are alive with patrons using our public internet access to look for work. We can point them to free web resources that can sharpen the skills that could help them land a new job.

Typing and Ten Key

It cracks me up that, even in the intensely visual realm of the virtual world Second Life [<http://secondlife.com>], the characters communicate by pausing, twisting, then playing “air keyboard” as their “meat world” counterparts type instant messages to each other. The web seems visual. Still, its primary mode of imparting information remains text-based. In the modern technological workplace, we’ve all got to know how to type. These sites can help.

TypingWeb

<http://www.typingweb.com>

Learning to type is never fun, but this program makes it as painless as possible. Register for free to track your progress in this professional-looking set of typing tutorials. Also available with a Spanish-language interface along with six other languages, including Chinese and Korean. iPhone users can download a TypingWeb application to improve texting skills.

Learn2Type

<http://www.learn2type.com>

Create a free personal account to track your touch-typing success on this venerable site. Learn the AZERTY European keyboard and the DVORAK format, too. Take typing and 10-key tests to earn printable certificates.

This Is Hard

In their article “30 Things We Know For Sure about Adult Learning,” Ron and Susan Zemke write, “Adults seek out learning experiences in order to cope with specific life-changing events — e.g., marriage, divorce, a new job, a promotion, being fired, retiring, losing a loved one, moving to a new city” [<http://honolulu.hawaii.edu/intranet/committees/FacDevCom/guidebk/teachtip/adults-3.htm>]. Our job-seeking patrons have strong motivation to develop new skills, even if it is difficult for them.

Helping our patrons find the information that they need to learn new job skills has a side benefit for us: it makes our own jobs so much richer! And one more benefit, sometimes we might even use these tools to improve our own performance or those of our colleagues and staff. ■

Irene E. McDermott spends so much time learning new things in the Crowell Public Library in San Marino, Calif., that her boss is beginning to get suspicious!
